INTRODUCTORY

ANCIENT glass is the frailest yet the most enduring memorial of past civilization. It endears itself to its lovers by the beauty of its forms and the brilliancy of its iridescence. It resembles the flashing of gold and silver, the opalescence of rare gems, and the colors of the rainbow. This is due to the long exposure to natural chemical agents while in the ground, and can not be successfully imitated; so in the splendid lustre that adorns those frail remains of the past the accumulated crust removed from their surface and the highly impregnated odor of the earth that has surrounded them for ages is the very evidence of their remote antiquity.

Museums as well as collectors here and in Europe vie with each other in obtaining the choice specimens of ancient glass. The British Museum owns the earliest dated specimen of glass. It is an Egyptian amulet, 3064 years B. C.

Our Metropolitan Museum of Art has the largest collection of ancient glass in this country.

The Romans were great lovers of beautiful glass. Nero paid 6,000 sesterces for two small cups of white glass with handles. He also paid £50,000 ($250,000) for one Murrhina bowl. The Arabs were also lovers of glass. Al-Hariri, an early Arabic writer, describes an iridescent glass vase shown to him as follows: "He set before us whatever is sweet in the mouth or fair to the eye, and after this he brought forth a vase which was as though it had been congealed of air or condensed of sunbeam motes, or moulded of the light of the open plain, or peeled from the white pearl."

According to Pliny the secret of glassmaking was discovered by the Phoenicians on the shores of the River Belus, near Acre, Syria. Pliny says that some Phoenician sailors trading in saltpeter, having gone ashore for the purpose of cooking their dinner, and not finding any stones upon which to build a hearth, improvised one of lumps of saltpeter which they brought from their ship, and when their meal was over they found among the ashes a semi-opaque dull-shining mass, the result of the fusion of saltpeter and sand, which proved to be glass.

The present collection is the largest and finest that has ever been offered for sale in this country. It includes rare specimens of Egyptian, Phoenician, Hebrew, Greek, Roman, Byzantine, and Arabic glass dating from 2,000 years B. C., to 400 A. D. Many specimens in this collection could not be duplicated anywhere at any price. Most of these pieces come from my own finds in Syria, only a few of them have been obtained by purchase. I guarantee them all to be genuine Antique and as described in this catalogue. The Tanagra figures I cannot guarantee. I purchased them from Greece and Asia Minor. Their modelling is exquisite. They are interesting not only in that they afford information as to the Greek life in the fourth century B. C., but because of their artistic value as works of art.

Any further information desired about any article in this collection will be cheerfully given by
